*Présentation de l'éditeur*With new foreword on the centenary celebrations of Easter 1916. "Guides you through the crazy realities of the everyday life of the United Kingdom's ugliest duckling" - Huffington Post. As we approach two decades since the signing of the Good Friday peace accord, it appears that the Northern Irish have finally shaken off a conflict which had scarred the Irish landscape for thirty years. However, the reality turns out to be much more complex as we find out from author Stiofán Cairns who takes us upon an unorthodox, humourous yet insightful journey through twenty-first century Northern Ireland. In an absorbing work on Ulster in its post-conflict era, we see Cairns - a native Catholic - disguising himself as a Frenchman in order to explore some of the toughest neighbourhoods of Protestant Belfast. Along with undertaking ethically dubious scientific studies that quantify the differences between Catholics and Protestants, Cairns offers bold analyses covering a range of subjects from religion through to sport. Essential to understanding this still much troubled part of the world and its stubbornly persistent tribal complexion. *Présentation de l'éditeur*With new foreword on the centenary celebrations of Easter 1916. The book takes a serious subject but presents its material with the kind of dry humour that might be expected from an Irishman. If I have one criticism though it appears that the author dips between biography and politics – although this might be intended. Definitely recommend it for anyone who takes an interest in Ireland, particularly the conflict in Northern Ireland. The history chapter itself makes this book worth the read.
